

Daniel Dragovich, 7th Grade

A degree would be an amazing thing to earn. If I had one, it would be very hard to get because there would need to be lots of time and effort put into it. With a degree I could also have more opportunities in life.

Right now I want to study sports management but with still 5 years till college I may change my mind. In college I will get to learn about many things including my major. I am looking forward to all the different classes I will get to take, and who knows I may change my major when I am in school.

While there are many great local colleges, I also may have to travel to an out of state university. Although I don't know where I am going, an out of state college would be very emotional to travel to because I won't be with my family. But if I go to a local college I will get to see family in person more often .

I am looking forward to the friendships I will make that will last forever. I will meet new people during class, living away from home, and playing sports. We will all have something in common, bonding and making fun memories, that will be as easy as sitting in a chair.

Going to college is a valuable experience because of all the things I will learn that I won't learn anywhere else. As I am exposed to new ideas I will learn how to understand new information and different people's perspectives on things. I will also meet people from different cultures from my own, and will understand the world a little better.

Many would relish the opportunity to get a degree or just to simply live a happy life with enough money to afford a house and food for a family or just themselves. I as well would love to have the thought lingering in my mind for years become a reality. Upon graduation I would love to be able to play in the MLS (Major League Soccer), but after I retire from playing in the MLS I can use my degree to work as a coach.

With all considerations' considered college is the first step to the epitome of my future career in life.
